Excerpt: . . . 11 It is important to note that most of our efforts in firefighting are done safely and well. Of the 10, 000 plus fires that the Forest Service fights on an average year, 98 to 99 percent of those are controlled through initial attack, and our safety record in this phase of firefighting is good. When faced with megafires, such as the Rodeo-Chediski Fire, the Biscuit Fire, or the Hayman Fire, we do that well and safely, too, and in fact our safety record is even better. But on some transition fires, as evidenced by our experience at Storm King, Thirtymile, and Cramer, agency performance has been lacking, contributing to the loss of life. We are working diligently to improve our performance and we believe we are working on the right things. Mr. Chairman and members...
