Excerpt: . looking forward to my novel destination with all its precarious results, it was but with a pilgrim s eye, which read this moral on every passing wave, that for the soul earth has no resting place--no sure abiding city: but they who seek a home, where the heart cannot ache, nor the eye weep, must press forward, through the waters of a world of woe, to the prize of our high calling in Christ Jesus, in whom alone is no variableness nor shadow of turning, and in whose blessed kingdom only, can be found the calm of an untroubled sea, and the joy in which the stranger intermeddleth not. A four months voyage is as the passing away of a world. It has its seasons of summer and winter, of calm and tempest; its conflicts with human passions--its making and marring of pleasant hours. A universe lives within a ship, but its good and evil seldom mingle with our after career, so soon are both forgotten. On these then I dwell not; but I remember well the bright and beautiful morning, on which we were early aroused to look upon the splendid scenery which surrounded us, as we passed through Bass Straits, and opened before us as we entered the fair haven of Sydney. It was early in June, the winter of that southern clime, a season which, there, might almost realize the poet s fancy of an elysium spring. The sky was...
